Social Feeds Entertaining your customers Public relations professionals often work in a fast-paced environment where their time is often very limited. Managing a project or relationship can be one of the most time-consuming aspects of public relations, and they often have to juggle other priorities as well. In order to have time to build and manage a customer relationship, it helps to have an approach to working with your customers that's more low-key and personalized, while still providing the professional service you'd expect. Your greatest asset Customers are often the source of your greatest opportunity to build relationships, and they can be one of your most important customers. Whether you're targeting small business owners, hospitals, or multinational corporations, your job as a public relations professional is to market your company's services and products in a way that will generate interest in your brand. But your personal touch with your customers is just as important, and just as valuable to your brand's overall success. The most effective public relations professionals build a personal relationship with their clients from the beginning. If you build a personal relationship with a customer and find out about his or her family and interests, you'll be able to better relate to them, as well as to others who you may meet in the course of your work. The end result is that you'll have a much easier time getting your message across and making them a fan of your brand. Personal touches are also important for relationships in which your work is less formal. For example, if you're representing a company that makes in-home fitness equipment, you could go to a client's home to give a demonstration. It's more fun and gives you the opportunity to tell the story of your product in a different setting, and it will give your potential customer a better idea of how you think about their problem and what you can do for them. Personal touches are also important for relationships in which your work is less formal. For example, if you're representing a company that makes in-home fitness equipment, you could go to a client's home to
