“The challenge of HyperMotion Technology is to produce accurate movement,” commented Smith. “This is the most important part of our work. We set out to achieve exactly what we want: authentic movements of players based on real-life movements. The other big challenge, of course, is the emotion of a player. We wanted the gameplay to feel as close to reality as possible.” Bodies of work in real life: real players in motion capture suits The technical analysis of player movements is performed in two parts. The “Fitness” part consists of video analysis of the player’s movements in motion using a “Match Analysis Tool” that provides comprehensive statistics for the player. In addition, “Match Impact Analysis” tools are used to analyze the impact on the match of individual actions of a player on the ball. HyperMotion and REPLAY GAMEPLAY HyperMotion technology builds off of REPLAY GAMEPLAY, which is a feature of FIFA that provides statistics about the intensity of a player’s actions. Technical development began during FIFA 17. The goal was to evolve gameplay to create a more realistic experience. REPLAY GAMEPLAY changes the intensity of actions depending on how quickly a player delivers or receives the ball. For example, the better the timing of a tackle, the more intense it will feel. In addition, the speed of passes is increased. With HyperMotion, specific areas of player movement are exaggerated: the distance covered by a player when running, the acceleration and velocity of a player sprinting, the height of a jump, the speed of a pass or a shot on goal. In essence, HyperMotion is a unique representation of player movement taken to the next level. The REPLAY GAMEPLAY feature uses data from the player’s match in motion to calibrate the intensity of player actions. This data is a result of the amount of work the player has done in the game. This is known as a player’s player-load. Based on this data, the REPLAY GAMEPLAY will produce a more intense feeling of player movement. This is accomplished by increasing the acceleration and deceleration of sprints and accelerations, the height of jumps, and how close a player sprints to the ball.
