Let me start by offering a couple of disclaimers. (1) The recent shooting at a Colorado Planned Parenthood clinic is playing out very differently than the other mass shootings that have rocked America, and that is why I suspect we are likely to see a host of new gun control laws passed in the wake of this attack. (2) I don't think that that violence can be excused or justified because of some moralizing argument about "the sanctity of human life." I believe that most Americans who oppose gun control don't have that view, and that most Americans who support gun control don't have that view. In other words, if we're going to try to deal with a problem we need to be clear about what we're talking about, and our disagreement is more about policy than it is about values. Even if these assumptions are correct, and there is plenty of reason to question them, one might well ask, why don't we get to the bottom of the problem? Why do all these mass shootings get so much attention in the media, but we don't see the same commotion when an everyday shooting takes place in the name of the 1%? Why do we get told that we don't need a gun control bill because all these mass shootings are isolated incidents, but when it comes to the 1% we aren't told that the problem is isolated but systemic? And those are good questions. The responses (in a nutshell) are that we're not given the time, or we don't take the time, to really understand the problem. We're told over and over again to just trust that we can ban automatic weapons, or restrict clips or put waiting periods on guns, etc. But these aren't real solutions, and in the meantime the problem continues to grow, and the 1% continues to rise.Q: IIS 7.5 redirect to Application We have a ASP.NET app deployed on a e79caf774b

A man has been left red-faced after a boat he owned was found to be leaking so badly there was no way of going anywhere in the fast-moving water. Mum-of-two Nick Dymott, 47, from Leicester, was forced to abandon the vessel after spending £36,000 on it. But he was told he was entitled to a refund – despite having to use his caravan for almost a month to dry out the water. Nick, an IT consultant, took delivery of the 25m Granite Tranzit yacht in July last year, after its previous owner failed to pay its mortgage on time. He began to assemble it while it was lying at a boatyard, and then finally launched it in May. In August, Nick and his girlfriend Bex, who's a trainee financial adviser, began spending £4,000 a month on the boat – taking it on holiday trips to the Mediterranean and sailing in the sea off the coast of Cornwall. Nick, from Pavement Close, Horsell, says: “After sailing the boat over to England for Christmas and spending a week doing some sailing, I started spending £1,500-£2,000 a month on maintenance for the boat, as the engine needed to be cleaned. “It would cost £1,200-£1,500 to hire a proper boat but it would save me having to get a new boat. “The boat was new at the time and cost £36,000 to buy. “After owning the boat for a couple of months, the sails
